
Robert Wasserstrom
Terra Group, wasserstromrobert@gmail.com

Follow this and additional works at: https://digitalcommons.trinity.edu/tipiti

Part of the Archaeological Anthropology Commons, Civic and Community Engagement Commons, Family, Life Course, and Society Commons, Folklore Commons, Gender and Sexuality Commons, Human Geography Commons, Inequality and Stratification Commons, Latin American Studies Commons, Linguistic Anthropology Commons, Nature and Society Relations Commons, Public Policy Commons, Social and Cultural Anthropology Commons, and the Work, Economy and Organizations Commons

Recommended Citation
Available at: https://digitalcommons.trinity.edu/tipiti/vol15/iss1/12

This Introduction is brought to you for free and open access by Digital Commons @ Trinity. It has been accepted for inclusion in Tipiti: Journal of the Society for the Anthropology of Lowland South America by an authorized editor of Digital Commons @ Trinity. For more information, please contact jcostanz@trinity.edu.

Most Tipiti readers already know that our colleague Bill Vickers died in September 2016. From the early 1970s onward, Bill worked with Secoya and Siona people in Ecuador’s north-eastern Amazon region. For the next two decades, he published widely read accounts of their traditional subsistence hunting and gardening practices, including a major Science article in 1988. At the same time, Bill was deeply involved in broader issues: chronicling the massive invasion of indigenous land by settlers from other parts of Ecuador; helping his Secoya and Siona friends defend their territorial rights; and ultimately, advising them about how to negotiate with oil companies. This work was very important to him, but is less well known to the wider academic community. In the following short remembrances, a group of Bill’s colleagues write about their experiences with him in the field or his influence on their own fieldwork. Our intention is to highlight what Bill sometimes called his “non-scientific” career: a long-term commitment to Secoya people and other native Amazonians.

—Robert Wasserstrom

[Editor’s note: Robert Wasserstrom has very helpfully contributed a map showing the location of Siona-Secoya villages mentioned by various authors. It may be found directly after the “References” section in Krøjjer’s article in this issue.]